Honosono, Pebruary 11TH, 1873.

THE report upon the Police Force, which we published yesterday, is on the whole satisfactory, and gives evidence that the attention which has been directed to police matters in Hongkong, has not been unproductive of useful results. There has, during the past year, been a falling off in crimes of a serious character, and particularly in burglaries, which, about a year and a halfago, were of such constant occurrence as to cause the most lively apprehension in the public mind. This species of offence may be taken as a fair sidered that the immediate evacuation of the test of the efficiency of the force, because burglary is a description of crime generally likely to be reported, and certain to come to the surface in all cases where Europeans are concerned. In respect to other offences, we unfortunately cannot draw too definite inforences from police statistics, because we can never be certain what proportion of the crimes committed are reported. We have always insisted upon the necessity of bearing this point in mind in discussing the true status of the Police, and in the face of some opposition, have questioned the reliability of the conclusions which have been on many occasions drawn merely from statistical returns. In the present report, the Captain Superin-TENDENT of Police incidentally admits the truth of this proposition. In speaking of (Foreign) Minister. The Address was agreed smoking. The defendant was boiling oplum in piracy; henotices that the returns show a large decrease, but he states that the falling off i due to the junk people becoming aware that no assistance will be offered by the British Government to hunt out the pirates beyond the limits of its jurisdiction, and they consequently abstain from making reports. There is always a danger that this abstaining from making reports will affect the reliability of Police statistics as an index of the amount of crime existing, and this is more particularly the case when we have to rely for reports upon Chinese Police, and is one reason against employing natives largely as policemen. In regard to all offences which it is comparatively easy to bush up, we are obliged to look with considerable doubt upon | Douglas. the returns made by the Police in a place like Hongkong. There may for this reason be grounds to look with some doubt on the statement made by the Captain Suprein-TENDENT; to the effect that the number of public gaming houses has been small. Before this statement can be accepted, we are bound to enquire what were the means ted it. Douglas was on shore on the 14th Janrelied upon for arriving at the fact. This very, and having gone to various places, requestion was asked directly by one of the members of Council, but he was met by the blm unaware of what was going on. this may be, so long as we have not even a general idea of the means which are taken to detect public gambling houses, it is impossible le draw any inference from the statements of the Police Report regarding them. The CAPTAIN SUPERINTENDENT BAYS With perfect confidence that the number of public gaming houses is small; but how after all does he know this? Simply from reports from the Chineso, on whom we think very few people would be disposed to rely in a mattor of this kind. Even if the natives were inclined to give information on such matters, there is the whole force of the bribes, which we know the gambling house keepers are willing to pay, to lessen any such inclination. It is noticeable that the Captain Superin-TENDENT, if he is unable to find out the existence of "public" gaming bouses, can find out that there are a number of gambling clubs, a circumstance which he thinks i necessary to note, with the addendum that the law cannot touch them. If these really are only private clubs, why is it necessary to notice them, and why should it be any subject of regret that the Law cannot touch them? It would seem very much that the CAPT. SUPERINTENDENT of Police looks upon these Clubs as a mere evasion of the law:

and the probability is that they are in fact nothing but the old public gaming houses under another form. If such is the case, the however, satisfactory that the Colony is at Douglas defied that he had been in from the Light-vessel. present at least relieved from the stigma which formerly attached to it of countenancing gambling by licensing it, but it would owner of the chair could not be found at the be well, so far as can be seen, either that some more effectual means of suppressing gam- knew nothing about the bearers of the chuir, gling than those at present adopted should and did not recognise either of the prisoners. No doubt the natives will from time to time give information concerning crimes, but it is too. much to be feared that they will always be disposed to shield their countrymen in such matters as gambling, where the general feeling is opposed to the Law; and the cost of their giving information in some directions will simply be their endeavouring to hush up offences in others. ORIGIN OF "THE TURF" IN ENGLAND.

In tracing the rise of horse-racing in England to its fountain head, our researches carry us back to the Saxon era. William of Malmesbury is the earliest authority on Equos Cursores amongst writers, and we are indebted to him for the knowledge that: "When Hugh, the head of the house of the Capets, afterwards monarchs of France, solicited the hand of Edelswitha, the sister of Athelstan he sent to that prince, among other valuable presents, several equos cursores (running herses), with their saddles and their bridles the latter being embellished with bits to yellow gold." : Hence we may infer that horse-racing was practised by the Anglo-Saxons, but most probably it was coulined to persons of rank and opulence. - Gentleman's Magazine.

IN THE DESERT.

A legion of camels and dromedaries were vicketed about, and the whole scene was indescribably picturesque and interesting. The groups of strange incongruously associated figures, their varieties of dress and feature, colour and language, filled the eye and the mind with a wealth of gratification. Now a gaunt-looking Bedouin on his camel with his striped haick, and long matchlock across his back—an Ishmaelite indeed. Then a gandy horseman, dressed in rainbow colours. and equipped with scimetar, ataghan, and pistols, careering by on a grey Arab steed. bedeeked with marvellous housings, and great shovel stirrups. NAPOLEON'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR it was important for us to clear up. THE DUKE D'ENGHIEN'S EXECUTION.

(From "The History of Napolcon the First,

by P. Lanfrey.) The Duc d'Enghien reached Paris on the Hasdrubal's Tent.-Hasdrubal lying on a couch; 20th of March, about eleven o'clock in the morning; he was detained at the gate till four o'clock in the afternoon, evidently for fresh orders from Malmaison. From thence he was conducted by the outer boulevards to the dungeon of Vincennes, where Bonaparte had placed as governor a confidential man, well worthy of the work over which he was to preside. It was that same Harel who had delivered up to him the innocent heads of Arena, Ceracchi, Topino Lebrun, and Demerville, for a crime of which he was the sole instigator and the sole perpetrator. The prince was then allowed to take some rest and refreshment. It has been discovered by a close inquiry that was afterwards instituted upon this tragical event, that when the Duc d'Englien arrived at Vincennes to be tried, his grave was already dug! Towards midnight he was awoke by Captain Dautan-For dying drams are sickly. Keep you whole, court, who commenced a preliminary examination, as reporter of the commission. His replies were simple, noble, and modest extremely clear, and perfectly truthful. He admitted that he had served all through the war, first as a volunteer, and afterwards as major of the vanguard of the Corps de Bourbon, that he received pay from England, and had nothing else to depend on. But he denied ever having known either Dumouriez or Pichegru. At the moment of signing the report, he wrote with his own hand upon the minute, "that he earnestly demanded to have a private interview with the First Consul. My name, my rank, my way of thinking, and the horror of my situation, he added, "make me hope that he will not refuse my demand. Yielding a million monthly, have brought back The choice of the hour alone indicated that his fate was decided. It is this request of a dying man, repeated a few minutes later before the commission, and not only foreseen but refused beforehand, as both Hullin and Savary attest, that is transformed, in the narrative of St. Helena, into a letter, which was kept back by Talleyrand, always thirsting for the blood of the Bourbons. "The duko," says Napoleon, "wrote me a letter, in which he offered me his services, and asked for the command of an army, and that wretch of a Talleyrand did not give it to me till two days after the death of the Prince?" This is a twofold and shameful calumny, one against Talleyrand, the other against the Duc d'Enghien, and the latter is particularly odious; it is like a blow struck by the executioner on the face of his victim after he has beheaded him. The Duke wrote no letter at all, much less such a discreditable one; but even if he had written it, either at Strasburg or at Vincennes, it would under no circumstances have been put into the hands of M. Talleyrand. It would have been sent with all the others papers direct to Malmaison, or, in case of a very improbable confusion, to the Grand Judge, or Real, who was charged with that it was addressed to M. Talleyrand, then per cent. of the surplus of the profits pro rata Minister for Foreign Affairs. Supposing him to have been the cruel monster that such deed would denote, Talleyrand was too pliant, too cautious, to act thus towards a man like Bonaparte. This anecdote can only do harm to the memory of him who invented it, and to the intelligence of those who have sanctioned it. At two o'clock in the morning, the Prince was brought before the military commission that General Hullin presided over. By the mournful and immovable passive obedience, it was easy to see that they had received their orders, and the condomnation of the accused was written upon their severe and dejected faces. Everything in them and about them declared the melancholy office they had accepted; the darkacrobat walking the tight-rope, with a baby ness which surrounded them, the mystery lasited to each of his ankles—the heads of the with which they proceeded, the silence and isolation of this nocturnal hour, the absence of witnesses, of the public, of a counsel, that is not refused to the worst of murderers, of all the forms for protecting the accused, the stealthy alacrity with which they hurried through their work, all these mute things have a terrible voice, which cries .- "These
